WHEREAS, Coloradans with intellectual and developmental disabilities want a person-centered system in which they are actively engaged in making informed choices to receive the right services, at the right time, and in the right places; and

WHEREAS, Colorado's community system for people with intellectual and developmental disabilities has a long and proud history of enabling people to move from large institutional services to smaller, community-based integrated services, offering alternatives in the types of services and supports they receive; and

WHEREAS, Colorado's community system for people with intellectual and developmental disabilities assists individuals in obtaining meaningful employment in a variety of settings, allowing them to work within their communities; and

WHEREAS, Direct-support professionals assist individuals with intellectual and developmental disabilities to lead self-directed and empowered lives and should receive adequate wages, benefits, and training; and
